When sport gets painful

RICHARD DABABNEH
Partner, Turner Freeman

AUSTRALIANS love their recreational pursuits, whether it's taking to the field with sporting teammates, heading outdoors or catching a wave over summer.

One of the unfortunate side effects of this passion is that sporting injuries are among the most common kinds suffered.

These vary from mild inconvenience through to severe disablement, with the most extreme cases leaving people unable to work, sometimes permanently.

Research with more than 1000 Australian surfers last year found about a third had suffered chronic injuries either caused by or aggravated while catching waves.

LEGAL QUESTION? ASK AN EXPERT

- Send your legal questions to legalhelp@turnerfreeman.com.au
- Tune in to the Chris Smith Afternoon Show on 2GB on Tuesdays from 1.30pm where a specialist lawyer will be available to take your calls.

After suffering an injury from sporting or recreational activities, the first priority should always be to obtain proper medical advice.

Whether you are a professional athlete or simply a weekend sportsperson, if you are injured there are legal options that may help.

Many people have access to benefits through their superannuation fund—total and permanent disablement entitlements and income protection are two common forms of cover linked to many super schemes.

If you have suffered a severe injury, you may be entitled to a claim under the Sporting Injuries Insurance Act. This legislation covers injuries suffered when engaging in a sporting activity as part of a club or association.

If you suffer an injury that leaves you with a permanent impairment or unable to work, or mounting medical bills, obtaining legal advice will help you understand what your options are and how you can pursue them.
